Converging evidence for the involvement of anterior cingulate in the extinction of avoidance behavior. Behavioral extinction following successful avoidance learning is characterized by gradual decrements in conditioned responding over consecutive response trials. Evidence from many studies indicates that the acquisition and expression of extinction may depend on the integrity of the cingulate cortex. Although some of these studies suggest a role for the anterior cingulate (ACC) in extinction learning, they have not systematically examined the ACC role in extinction across different component behaviors. Furthermore, the questions of whether the ACC is necessary for extinction of contextual fear, individual instrumental behavior, or any combination of behaviors, remain unanswered. The current experiment examined the role of the ACC in extinction of two different component behaviors, social avoidance and instrumental extinction. In the first experiment, the differential effects of cingulotomy and sham-operated controls were assessed on the expression of the conditioned avoidance response (CAR) and the development of instrumental extinction in laboratory mice. In the second experiment, the role of the ACC in extinction of the CAR was examined on extinction of the CAR at the operant presser lever. The results indicate that the ACC is necessary for the extinction of both behaviorally mediated and contextual fear and that these effects are specific to two component behaviors. These findings suggest the involvement of the ACC in the extinction of two different strategies. Hypermethylation of the CXCL12 gene promoter in the glioma cell line U-87MG. The chemokine ligand 12 (CXCL12) is a chemotactic factor that guides both normal hematopoietic stem cells and some tumor cells to the site of inflammation. CXCL12 expression is transiently increased in reactive astrocytes following traumatic injuries in the central nervous system. To investigate whether CXCL12 is a potential target molecule in glioma development, we analyzed the methylation status of the CXCL12 promoter region in the glioma cell line U-87MG. Since U-87MG cells expressed a high level of CXCL12 mRNA, whereas low levels of CXCL12 protein expression were detectable by flow cytometric analysis, we conclude that CXCL12 gene expression in U-87MG cells was not regulated by a post-transcription
