I realized something when I upgraded to Lightroom 3. Although I am experienced with Photoshop, I didn't learn how to do a lot of things that Photoshop has become capable of in just the last couple of years. On my machine, at least, Photoshop CS4 has become so "heavy" that it's easy to imagine getting tired, and not wanting to use any of the tools at all. Moreover, the version retains learn-by-doing concepts as well. If you are used to working with it, everything will probably come quite easily, and if not - well, you'll have to struggle. It would be great if the new tools could be learned independently of the interface, but so far this is not the case. So far, this release of Photoshop includes Amazon.com's JPG/PNG web viewer, new Progressive Web App (PWA) for photographers, built-in support for fingerprint-based logging, new Affinity Designer Mockups for new features, and a streamlined Design View for Art Board documents. In addition, Version 24 includes Metal Previews and update to Photoshop Camera Raw to version 14.1.4, which includes 10 new features. After implementing all of these changes, I was pleasantly surprised to find that I've been using Photoshop Elements the same or even more than Photoshop CS. It's possible, of course, that some of the changes I've pointed out aren't really that noticeable, but they're easy to spot. For example, you can now set preferences for PSD files, such as preferences for pasting a bitmap onto an elliptical selection. In the past, you could only set preferences in the configuration file.
