It's become common to use metric units to describe density of a certain thing, e.g. "5kg per m<sup>3</sup>" or "1:4". I understand that we have no other choice, but the rules for the plural of metric units seem somewhat arbitrary to me. I suppose I could come up with some rule myself, but is there a standard one? A: I found these explanations on the Internet: The SI units are names and the English units are measurements. (1) So here is a great explanation: What should I call these units? The only units that can be spoken of as units are the SI units. What are they? The three SI units are the meter, kilogram and second. They have the following dimensions: meter (m):  $10^{-3}$  meters kilogram (kg):  $10^{-3}$  kilograms second (s):  $10^{-7}$  seconds The SI units are measured with only one set of units, the metric units. When one expresses a quantity with a unit, the unit always comes first and the quantity second. The plural of the metric units is the metric units. So "1 metre per  $10^{-3}$  metres" means one metre per 0.01 metre. I guess it's a very simple explanation, but I agree with it: the metric units are named and the English units are measured. (2) The metric system is a system of measurement in which certain units of length, mass, time and temperature are defined. A: Strictly speaking, they shouldn't be plural, but it is convenient to use
