Adobe just seems to be getting better and better. A few years ago, Adobe was kind of stuck in the mud; they dragged over their old creative suite of Photoshop, Illustrator, InDesign, and the rest. Now their product is far more robust, expertly designed, and powerful. Adobe Photoshop CS2 originally came with 5GB of storage. In Lightroom 5, the default storage location for a project is in the same location as Photoshop. That does reduce the number of file system directories you have to monitor and clean. This was intentional. Adobe has added many other improvements in the latest release (Adobe Photoshop Lightroom 8). These include Adjustment Layer simplification, a Rapid Mask tool for fast retouching using layer masks, and Auto Repair for detecting and automatically correcting issues in enlarged photos. Adobe really didn't change very much from Photoshop. But most of the attempts by Adobe to be serious about mobile photography apps have been more frustrating than helpful. In 2015, they announced a Phone App. It was supposed to be a one-touch tool for JPEG straightening, and it was going to co-exist with Lightroom. When that effort got shut down a year later, no other attempts to bring serious Photoshop capabilities to mobile have happened—although it is interesting to see that Adobe is now declaring the need to get serious about mobile photography. In the past year or so, the company also added App-based fixes and an In-Camera Profile inspector to Lightroom. But, mobile apps have taken over, and Photoshop has stagnated.

Those who could not afford Photoshop itself can still use the free version of Photoshop Elements to edit their photos. Adobe Photoshop Elements isn't the Photoshop application. It also has elements of Photoshop's toolset, but with fewer features of course. And because it uses a separate, web-based ecosystem, it is easy to work on multiple projects on a single PC. As a web-based tool, Elements also gives you access to tools that your Internet connection can provide and your browser can deliver.
