We have had high expectations for lightroom 5 of course, but for a change we are pleased to see it is a different kind of lightroom to what we have known before. Having moved from someone else's previous version which was let down in several respects, I had high expectations for the new version. I knew that lightroom 5 would have to have a lot of its features built from the ground up, but I didn't quite expect them to be so obvious. However, this is a new version and lightroom 5 will evolve over time. In fact, as it evolves and the developers improve certain parts of it, some of it will already be considered obsolete. It's never enough to just say that you're a better than lightroom 4, lightroom 5 can only be an improvement. This, in other words, is the best that you can do at image editing. With the native API further collaboration between the two products is being discussed with the introduction of the new interface and architecture behind new features in Photoshop and the Rangefinder lens, and the new DirectCompute 2D graphics stack that provides the new native GPU APIs for direct access to the new Web Assembly based GPU. This is a big deal for the developers since creating graphic apps on the mobile platform is being done with resources being pushed by the developers to, which is building a great amount of apps from the designers that were once only possible on the PC.
