The beta of CS4.5 includes a number of new features announced at the 2004 International Conference on Information Technology – "ITMedia". The biggest one is a feature called "Digital Darkroom" that optimizes your images in a photo-optimization program. Digital Darkroom uses a series of proprietary algorithms to analyze your images and automatically correct for such things as uneven lighting and white balance. According to Adobe, "CS4.5 also includes enhanced automated color correction and more powerful adjustments for Curves and Levels, curves, and the Shadows, Highlights and Whites tool (SHW); the automated Black & White adjustment (B&W); and more. CS4.5 also provides a number of "behind the scenes" changes including a new implicit Crop, Bracketing, Seek and Shift tool, a new crop tool called Auto-Crop, and enhanced DNG file support. But Adobe has also made some significant changes to the tools it calls Layer Modes. There are six now, with one that essentially provides background image removal. For photo editing, you have all the tools Adobe gives with CS3.0, including [Enhanced] Curves, Resize, Move, and Rotate tools. There is a powerful new Selection and Mask tools that let you paint tiny areas of selection and then quickly erase tiny areas or parts of an image. But the big news for the long list of new destinations for all your image hosting, collaboration, and editing is the inclusion of Adobe's recently announced and widely anticipated Creative Cloud website. The site, hosted on Adobe's cloud infrastructure, is intended to serve as a central repository for your images, videos, and other content. You'll find a new interface that is clean, easy to use, and intuitive. But the big news is that you can use your site and your Creative Cloud membership across all of your devices. You can create a site, upload content, and access and edit it on any of your computers, phones, and, yes, even the iPad. This is big news for documentarians and photographers who work on the go, but find their main tool is a laptop, then a camera, and they have no local storage or computing capability.
