The new Print module consists of a very user-friendly panel for making print layouts. It offers three types of layout features: Design (for icons, grids, etc.), Stacks (to arrange your images), and Custom, which lets you customize the way you want to display your images. The Design section is the most important part of the Print module. It lets you arrange your images into different layouts, such as stacks and grids, and resize them. When you're done with arranging your images, you can click the Create Print Layouts button to save the print layouts to your hard drive. Make sure to keep the settings and metadata the same as you expect your photos to look like. The Stacks section provides you with display options that you can use to arrange your images into stacks. You can drag an image into a stack and move it around the page. There are very simple and easy-to-use selection handles for cropping and rotating images or groups of images. In addition to the new Print module, the UPLabs module has also been introduced. It was the most visible improvement in Lightroom 4's new UI. It's similar in features with its namesake package, the incredibly popular UFRAW which was once the fastest RAW converter on the market for those who need to convert RAW images.

The new feature allows teams to rapidly collaborate even when others don't have Adobe Creative Cloud accounts and access to the app itself so they can use their shared notebooks and deliver to a common stream of creative work. Based on the proven Adobe Keynote sharing tool, Share for Review allows five people, or an unlimited number with Adobe Creative Cloud members, to share a dynamic presentation -- such as a video, 3D model or interactive infographic -- and send it to one or more other viewers. These viewers can then mark up the presentation, make edits and annotate in real time, while others in the group are able to also make changes to the presentation without affecting the original. And with a simple Mac or Windows-based pull request, the team has complete control over the shared presentation for the duration of the group collaboration, allowing the team to make announcements, get feedback on changes, publish and live-stream the final product, and manage permissions for different team members.
