I have been trying to fix this problem with no avail. .Q: Is there a way to make Static Analyzer not complain about unused code? I have created a class which I use inside an other class. The class is used to store values from a database, it contains all the fields which I use inside the class and also a public static string. Now I would like to write the whole thing inside a second class so it's easier to modify (because I will use only the property accessor). The problem is that I am aware that I must have the "comming" static class (I use the second class inside the first one) but when I analyze this with the Static Analyzer I get the following message, it seems to be that the static information is not null and empty and therefore I get the message: Object reference not set to an instance of an object. This is my code: Class code file: public sealed class Person { //... public string Name; //... } Class file I would like to get rid of: public sealed class Person { //... } Class file that I am using: public sealed class Role : Person { public string RoleName; public static string Roles { get; set; } } Is there any
