They understand that first impressions really do matter, so, when you choose a software product, spend some time getting educated on the features and use some information to make an informed purchase decision. The one thing less than stellar was its inability to use newer RAW files as part of the ACR function. As with Photoshop, the features available in Photoshop Touch are similar to the latest version of that product. But they aren't identical of course, because with Photoshop Touch they were aimed at developing markets.

Touch owners may find that the lack of finger-based gestures and a lack of the tablet interface can make navigating Photoshop or Photoshop Elements a bit harder than iPhone or iPad owners might expect. Any interaction that needs the user to swipe, rotate, or pinch requires a change in the way Touch works, and since it doesn't have all the models or features of a laptop or desktop computer, that's more difficult for some people to get used to. The hardware was totally fine for the last few years I used it and the latest 12.1 update has finally fixed the issues of scaling below retina in Photoshop CS3 that SO many users have been complaining about. I absolutely love the Global Eraser. It's a very useful tool. I use it all the time to paint out things in photos because it makes a zillion variations of a pattern.

Adobe Photoshop was, from its beginning, supposed to be a universal graphics software. So, when they were developing it, the first version of Photoshop, the Photoshop 1 was released. It supported different file formats like TIFF, Adobe Photoshop 3 (PS3) files, and many other formats. When they were developing this, they used to have the PNG format support, so it was a really stable and powerful file. But, Adobe changed the plan later, saying that the PNG support was redundant when the JPEG format was invented and they started to support JPEG format and they were planning to move the file format from 'TIFF' to 'JPEG,' but they still supported it because it was the best file that they could find and that everyone was using. But some people changed this format thinking that it was malleable and they started to use it, because it was a new thing. The introduction of the GIF support was, in fact, a gift by Adobe Photoshop to the web world. GIF for TIFF was, in fact, the first practice of converting TIFF files to GIF, and it was very popular. The GIF support macro on Photoshop was the most preferred thing for webmasters, and it was the most easy publicity tool in the web world back then, and that's why Adobe made it. The next version, 'Photoshop 2,' introduced some new features, but it didn't introduce new file format support, and it was all about performance and image editing, and it was releasing this months after Photoshop 1, and it was a huge success. Adobe Photoshop 2 was released in September of 1992, and it used to give some develop power over the Photoshop 2 was a 'Photoshop 3,' and it gave some new features to the users, and it was still the most powerful editing program of its time. And since then, Photoshop has been used by the amateur and professional photographers worldwide.
