An expansion joint is typically installed between the subsea production facility and the wellhead. The expansion joint is used to absorb thermal expansion and contraction of the trunkline that occurs during production flow. The expansion joint and/or subsea production facility may be provided with a subsea female receptacle at a wellhead of the production flow that secures the trunkline. The subsea female receptacle is configured to receive a corresponding male connector of a manifold. The manifold may be fluidly connected to a connection structure that is coupled to a subsea tubular. An annular space may be formed between the male connector of the manifold and the female receptacle of the subsea production facility. The annular space is normally filled with a lubricant such as, for example, a liquid or a gel. During installation, the male connector of the manifold is inserted into the female receptacle of the subsea production facility in order to provide a fluid tight seal between the male connector and the female receptacle. Due to factors such as, for example, pressure, temperature, and corrosive conditions, the male connector may expand and contract relative to the female receptacle. However, the male connector and/or female receptacle may not be thermally isolated from the subsea trunkline or any other components coupled to the subsea trunkline. Accordingly, the
