Recipients of services are often clinically and cognitively impaired with low levels of social function. However, different levels of social function are associated with different levels of psychopathology. This paper reports a study of key features of the psychological functioning of service recipients in one area of Victoria, Australia. A cohort of 504 clients who received services was administered a battery of standardised psychometric tests. Prevalence of cognitive impairment ranged from 48% to 90%. Half or more of the sample had sub-clinical levels of social function, and 43% had been identified as having a disability within the previous 12 months. Clients were characterised by high levels of psychopathology and were socially isolated and socially disorganised. High levels of symptomatology and impairment were related to high levels of social function. Less severe levels of psychopathology were associated
