Photoshop will now import TIFF images using 8-bits per color channel as well as adding the ability to edit eight-bit images without the need for color conversion. TIFF images can now be imported directly into Photoshop without the need for conversion. The most significant addition includes the ability to edit 8-bit images without the need for color conversion. A new 8-bit import embeds the entire bit depth into the file header. This new import is optimized to handle the variety of color and grayscale, and even supports the most complex color spaces like Cyanotype true-color and Apollo true-color plus a new library and flexible color profile support. The new 8-bit import makes it easy to view and edit TIFF files, and can't be removed from Photoshop after import. Photoshop fully supports XMP metadata. It allows you to choose items from a list and drop them into the current document. You can also insert an existing Droplist. The Style Builder tool lets you create and edit styles for making web designs reusable while the Intelligent Object Selection tool enables you to quickly and easily select and group common objects.

In the new version of Photoshop it is possible to iron out creases and wrinkles using a tool called Remove Red Eye. To save the best moments, Adobe has introduced the Stop Motion feature in Photoshop, that lets users record video of up to 150 frames per minute. The latest version of Photoshop lets users be able to open content stored in the cloud in the background. The end of support for the previous version of Photoshop means that there will no longer be automatic updates - making these features inoperable. All of this new development is really great news for photographers, but it comes at a price. As much as Photoshop is great for photographers, it isn't a perfect software package.
